The present invention relates generally to self-defense knives, and more particularly to a thumb stud having a knife blade mounted thereon. Generally, self-defense knives have been well known in the prior art. With the advent of modern technology, a variety of new self-defense knives have been developed that are relatively safer than traditional designs and that are relatively easier to operate than the newly designed knives. However, knives such as those described in U.S. Pat. No. 5,707,200 and U.S. Pat. No. 5,715,566 are intended to be carried in a pocket or a purse and used when the owner is out and about. Thus, they are not designed to be easily accessible. Accordingly, there is a need for a relatively smaller self-defense knife that is easily accessible and that is effective for use when out and about, particularly when the owner is traveling. It is to this need that the present invention is directed. In one aspect of the invention, a self-defense knife is provided. In one form, the self-defense knife includes a handle, a blade attached to the handle, a blade guard for covering the blade, and a thumb stud mounted to the blade. The thumb stud is resilient and is connected to the handle and the blade guard. A finger hole is formed through a top of the blade guard. A thumb hole is also formed through the top of the blade guard. In one form, the thumb hole and the finger hole are aligned. In another form, the thumb hole and the finger hole are offset from one another. In another form, the self-defense knife includes a thumb stud mounted to the blade.
